The relationship between the variables: Calories, fat, saturated fat, sodium and salt in foods in rural Venezuela. The low caloric density of the Venezuelan diet has been attributed to the high proportion of carbohydrate, and consequently the low intake of total fat and saturated fat. On the other hand, salt consumption is higher than the current recommended values. This study sought to analyze the relationship of the different nutrient variables of the diet with their availability in foods in rural Venezuela. Direct observation techniques were used to collect data. A computerized database was designed that identified a total of 757 food items. The database determined the percent energy values of the different components of the diet using the ENNS (National Food and Nutrition Services) 1990/91 Food Tables. Possible correlations between the available nutrient variables and food groups were investigated using data analysis software. Fifty-nine foods and beverages were consumed by the population, accounting for 757 foods and beverages. Each food contained an average of 53% of energy and saturated fats, 9% of sodium, 58% of total carbohydrate, and 36% of protein. Only sugar-sweetened soft drinks were not consumed by the population. The nutritional status of the population was a reflection of the pattern of food choices and intake. The relationship of energy, fat, and saturated fat with the distribution of foods in the diet was to be expected. Likewise, the relationship of sodium and total carbohydrate with the consumption of foods was to be expected because these nutrients are the best variables to relate them with. The study showed that there is a strong relationship between available food and the food that is consumed by the population. It also demonstrated that the traditional ingredients and the type of food were greatly influenced by availability.

Q: How to create a map with a configurable time frequency? I need to create a map with a configurable time frequency. Let's say the map is a 100x100 rectangle, and the time frequency is x seconds. How can I achieve this? I am thinking something like this: (defn fn [t] (take x (vec (map (fn [i j] (if (pos? t) i j)) (range 100 100)))))) But it doesn't work... A: Or, you could do: (def x 1

Nanoscale characterization of nanoparticles in mesoporous silica. The development of methods for the mass analysis and quantification of nanoparticles is, as yet, an unfinished task. Current approaches focus on surface-related nanoscale characteristics. We report here a novel method that allows for the detection of nanoparticles encapsulated in mesoporous silica, based on the combination of contactless atomic force microscopy imaging, atomic force microscopy imaging in fluid and electrochemical measurements. The method is validated by an experimental study of single silica nanoparticles. Nanoparticles show an adhesion under liquid in which the interparticle force changes in a controllable way. This adhesion behavior is studied in detail and is shown to be affected by a local viscous environment. The possible applicability of this method to the detection of solid nanoparticles in mesoporous materials is discussed.
